Jenny joined the Bravo cc team in 2017 when I invited her to collaborate with me as my research partner and co-author of our book Talking ‘Bout My Generation. We both share an affinity for this topic and Millennials in particular. It makes sense as we made the college classroom our home for many years—starting at the same time that Millennials were coming to the college campus. Jenny is a master facilitator—and that is not a term I use for many people. It takes YEARS to reach this level and for the last fifteen years she has done just that as a college professor, teaching communication studies courses. Jenny has a fierce sense of humor and a Mid-Western sensibility that allow her to quickly connect and get to work—because there are important things to accomplish. Her keynotes include:

TALKING BOUT MY GENERATION

Generations should be your GREATEST strength, not your BIGGEST headache

There are FOUR generations in the workplace today and boom! bam! pow! the fireworks show can’t be missed! It is time to step away from the finger pointing, blanket statements, and trash talk about each other and find common ground. Relying on tired and cliched generational stereotypes about one another do little to promote an environment where people are inspired to do great work by collaborating with one another. If you are tired of the tone of the generations conversation, this talk will be a breath of fresh air. No name calling. No labels. Just a desire to learn and do better.

THE “C” FACTOR: Unlock the Confident and Credible Communicator in You.

You communicate for a variety of reasons. The question is, how well do you do it—this thing called communication? The truth is, there is a BIG OLE GRAND CANYON sized difference between communicating and communicating effectively. Effective communication is a choice to practice with intention being deliberate, delivering the right message to the right audience, and choosing the right time and place to do it. Done well, effective communication changes outcomes for the better. Your relationships are more satisfying, you get better results around the things that matter to you, you thrive professionally, and you feel more confident. Learn “C” strategies to refine, redefine, or event reinvent the way you communicate.
